String Quartet, No. 2 in D Major (1881)

Aleksandr Borodin, Russia's most famed chemist, also stands as an important figure in Russian music. Although his chamber music is slender in size, Borodin claimed himself immortality becoming known as one of the "Mighty Five," standing along side of Balakirev, Cui, Rimsky-Korsakov and Mussorgsky. Written in the summer of 1881, the String Quartet, no 2 is an important work in the development of the string quartet in Russia. Before the quartets of Tchaikovsky and Borodin, the Russian string quartet as a genre was yet to be fully established—it seemed of little importance. In 1871, with the founding of the Russian String Quartet, new life surged through Russian chamber music and by extension, the string quartet. Borodin's quartet not only exerted considerable influence, it also represents his musical ideals. His focus on "real tunes" is evident throughout the work as melody reigns, showing his preference for lyricism over abstraction and development of small motivic units.

The first movement opens with a tuneful line played by the cello and immediately taken up by the first violin. The alternation evidenced in these opening measures is a facet of the movement, which offers only brief moments in which the second violin and viola share in melodic material.

The Scherzo not only replaces the usual trio by expanding the movement to full sonata-form, it also reorients the usual order of movements, providing stronger contrast between the first movement and the Nocturne. It opens light-hearted in tone; however, only the sweeping rhapsodic thirds of the slower waltz-like second theme bring the otherwise sprightly movement into the same lyrical orbit as the rest of the work.

With the opening of the Nocturne, a heavy and languorous atmosphere melts into sensuous relaxation, as the well-known theme appears first in the cello. The second theme, a risoluto scale-passage, heightens the germ of passion planted in the opening measures. The ever-changing color of the movement concludes in mellow ripeness.

Based on the varied treatment of two themes and a contrasting second subject, the question-answer design of the Finale is at times more angular than the previous movements. While melody still dominates, it lacks the overall lyricism previously seen—perhaps justifying the comment frequently made which suggests that the Finale fails to compare to the three preceding movements.
