INTRODUCTION

The Centre for Research on Canadian-Russian Relations (CRCR) was established in 1990 with the help of a generous grant from the Donner Canadian Foundation. At that time it was an Organized Research Unit (ORU) of the History Department at Carleton University. Since July 2006, the CRCR has been part of the Institute for University Partnerships and Advanced Studies (IUPAS), Georgian College, Barrie, Ontario.

An eighteenth century British travelogue writer once proclaimed that “to understand ourselves better, we must see ourselves as others see us.” Historians of Canada have ignored for the most part the wealth of commentary and analysis about “us” produced over the last 200 years by scholars, journalists, political leaders, bureaucrats and private citizens living in our largest neighbour, Russia. Russians have studied us precisely because Canadians and Russians have far more in common than is usually assumed: we share the North; we share the complications of living on very large, but mostly under populated territories; we fish and hunt the same things; we grow, dig up, cut down, and market the same things. We have diverse, multi-language and multi-ethnic populations; we have been, and may yet again be, each other’s main competitors in world markets (grains and lumber in the 19th century; energy in this century). Our two countries have been enemies longer than we have been friends, but in either case we need to know how we appear in our neighbour’s mind’s eye.

The Centre’s mandate is to study all dimensions of the Canadian-Russian relationship and to disseminate information about it. As a means to that end, the CRCR has been gathering published and archival materials about Canada in the Russian-language. The greater part of these sources have been found in various archival collections and libraries in Russian – in Moscow, St. Petersburg, Vladivostok and Khabarovsk. The Centre now holds by far the largest single collection of this type in this country. Our archival documentation, now approaching 20,000 pages, is filled with information and judgements about Canada and individual Canadians formulated in St. Petersburg and Moscow, most of which have not yet been studied by Canadian researchers.

Book 1 lists only published materials, and is the smallest part of the CRCR collection. Book 2 is dedicated to our archival documents, and Book 3 registers books, documents and articles in the CRCR’s special subject holdings.

<sup>5</sup> Slaviane (Slavs) was founded in Moscow in 1942 as a monthly organ of the USSR Slavic Committee. Its expressed purpose was to unite world Slavdom "for the struggle, in alliance with all freedom-loving peoples, against the Hitlerite Germans and their vassals." A complete run of the journal, 1942-1958, is available at the University of Toronto.

All spellings of names are as they appeared, in Russian, in the journal. Names as they are known in Canada are sometimes added.
